

> To whom it may concern,

>

> I feel that testing such as this, which presumably is for the greater good of the service provided to clients, should be administered free of charge.

>

> I also feel that testing on Psychologists should be conducted semi-regularly (free of charge) to ensure that knowledge is upheld.

>

> I feel that examining those who have completed post-graduate studies further is likely to be a waste of time, those who actually make it through post-graduate studies are likely to have a better theoretical knowledge than those who have been out practising for some time.

>

> The costs of examinations such as this when placed onto the Psychologist are basically just going to end up adding to the cost of an already expensive treatment for the clients.

>

> I agree with the principle of providing the best care for client, I do not agree with charging or making those who've recently graduated sit an exam, or paying for these exams. The whole thing seems like a pointless way for a big organisation to make more money, rather than an exercise in ensuring the best care for the client. For shame.